PUBLIUS AELIUS HADRIANUS

In selecting his successor, Trajan passed over several of his chief military associates in favor of a distant relative named P. Aelius Hadrianus. The formal act of adoption was delayed to the very last, and so gave rise to the rumor that Hadrian owed his elevation to a ruse created by Plotina. Plotina was alleged to have kept Trajan's death a secret until an official bulletin of a death-bed adoption had been safely launched. However, various earlier marks of favor which Trajan bestowed upon the next emperor are sufficient proof that he had made his choice with true discernment.

Born in 76 A.D., Hadrian lost his father at the age of ten and was placed under the guardianship of Trajan. Being a great favorite with Trajan, because of his handsome person and his captivating manners, he afterwards drew closer the bonds of friendship by marrying the emperor's niece, Sabina, daughter of Marciana. In 101 A.D. he became questor, and at the expiration of that office, followed Trajan to the Dacian war. His military career was strengthened with successful campaigns in Dacia and Pannonia Inferior which led to his consulate in 109. Growing more and more in favor with Trajan, he was appointed "legatus" to conduct the war then pending with Parthia. Because of ill health, Trajan prepared to return from the East in 117 and left Hadrian with the command of the army in Syria. Shortly afterwards, Trajan died at the city of Selinus in Cilicia, and Hadrian, in the virtue of letters of adoption, signed by Plotina and forwarded to Rome, took at Antioch the title of emperor without waiting for the Senatorial Confirmation.

The interest of Hadrian in the provinces was manifested by his systematic tours of inspection. He visited all but a few remote corners of his dominion. He made a grand tour of the empire in 121 - 6, travelling along the Rhine and Danube fronts, making an excursion into Britain, passing through Spain into Mauretania and Africa, and concluding his rounds with a long sojourn in Asia Minor and Greece. In 129 - 34, he made a similar progress through the eastern provinces as far as Egypt. Of the twenty-one years of his reign, Hadrian spent more than half outside of Italy. Though his travels served to gratify his curiosity as a sightseer and to provide an outlet for his restless activity, the main purpose undoubtedly was to give him a first-hand acquaintance with provincial government in all the three continents. He was able to exercise a more effective control over his subordinates than any previous emperor.

The large series of coins relating to the journeys of Hadrian display a remarkable uniformity of design and legend (see lots 1 - 22). All of these coins were struck toward the end of his reign, when Hadrian had finally returned to Rome to rest from his endeavors. Mattingly states, "they represent, not a preliminary announcement of his imperial program, not a running commentary on the gradual execution of his plans, but rather the crowning of his life - task, the comment on the text of an accomplished work." One series, inscribed with the legend FELICITATI AVG, is accompanied by the type of the galley rowing or sailing (lots 1 - 4; see also cover coin), suggests that the emperor is travelling happily from shore to shore of the empire (as the emperor travelled frequently by ship), carrying happiness with him wherever he goes. Another series shows the provinces of the Roman Empire represented as female figures in appropriate attire and with distinguishing attributes (lots 6 - 11, 13 - 19, 21). A third represents the ADVENTVS (arrival) of the emperor in the various provinces by a scene of sacrifice in which Hadrian and the personified province stood face to face (lot 20; see also 60 - 61). Finally the RESTITVTOR series shows Hadrian as "restorer" extending his hand to raise to her feet the province kneeling before him (lot 12).

Another most remarkable and rare series is that of the LIBERALITAS type which represents the emperor distributing largesses to the citizens from a platform (lots 23 - 25). This wonderful series of gifts to the public clearly represent a definite intention of Hadrian. By his wise administration and peaceful policy, he undoubtedly saved considerable sums of money. In using a large part of these savings, Hadrian strived for something more than the desire to win cheap popularity. He wanted to raise the standard of living and encourage citizens to rear families. Trajan distributed no fewer than 650 denarii, Hadrian 1000, and Antoninus Pius 800 per person. Boasting to be "Restorer of the World" (lot 22), this lot displays a vivid and comprehensive picture of Hadrian's work and brings before us with remarkable force, the interest and care that he devoted to the individuals of his Empire.
